the heart in utero. The developing heart is shown in the chick embryo to be specialized to perform its primary functions, that is, to circulate blood and to provide for the needs of the developing embryo, in particular, of the central nervous system. This is due to the structural and functional changes which occur in the heart from stages of 12 to 24 hours of incubation. The heart receives, as it is growing and differentiating, signals from the growing brain which influence its shape and function. The earliest phase in which the blood-forming tissue of the heart is functionally active is from 24 to 30 hours of incubation. It is suggested that the morphological and physiological alterations in the heart from stage 28 of incubation onwards are influenced by these early functional changes. If you're a Doctor Who fan and really, really like the idea of playing with action figures, then today is the day for you! The Doctor Who Collectibles Facebook group has launched a charity auction for a pair of action figures from the Matt Smith era of the show. It's something that's definitely not unheard of and it's something that's certainly become a bit more common over the past few years as more official figures from the show have started to trickle out.

However, these figures are unique because the one going to charity will be the real
