measure of trade in New Zealand is the balance of trade, this indicator is also called a trade balance.

This shows the difference in total export and import between two or more countries. It is often interpreted as the amount of goods that New Zealand earns from another country (through exports), and the amount it buys from that country (through imports). The value of goods and services traded with New Zealand (in US dollars) divided by the value of goods and services produced in the country (in US dollars) is called the domestic price deflator. The current value of the New Zealand Dollar (NZ$) at the day of the survey is used to calculate the international price deflator. The left-hand panel shows the New Zealand domestic price deflator in the main industries and sectors since 1990. Since 1990, the value of the NZ$ (right-hand panel) has increased relative to other major currencies and currencies in the region. Since the 1990s, the value of the New Zealand Dollar (NZD) has gradually weakened relative to other currencies. In some periods, the strength of the New Zealand Dollar (i.e. the difference in value between NZD and other currencies) is driven by demand from exporters, and from importers looking to buy at lower prices than they could elsewhere. This decline has resulted in a significant shift in the composition of exports from manufacturing to services. In the early 1990s, the value of imports and exports of manufactured goods (i.e. goods produced by manufacturing industries) was three times that of service exports. Since then, the value of imports has increased relative to exports of manufactured goods. Foreign Direct Investment and GDP This economic indicator shows the stock of foreign direct investment (investments in or by institutions, corporations, etc.) in a country in relation to the stock of gross domestic product (GDP). GDP measures the total value of goods and services produced in a country in one year. Gov.
