Today, financial institutions, including commercial, education and government institutions, provide daily financial services, such as the provision of financial aid, student loans, etc. Common among these services is the need to verify information submitted by users who request financial services. As an example, Federal Family Education Loan Program (FFELP) students may use a financial aid system that verifies their identity to participate in their financial aid program. The financial aid system verifies the identity of a student by obtaining the student's social security number (SSN) or similar identifying number. Financial aid personnel submit the student's SSN to the FFELP system and the system determines if the SSN has been previously used by a student. If so, the financial aid system will not process the identification. This verification process is known as the "verification" of the student identity. As another example, a student may use a student loan program to obtain funds. The student loan program receives the student's name and SSN and sends a verification code back to the student via a telephone. The student may now use the funds. This verification process is known as the "verification of the source of the student funds". Financial institutions may use many systems or databases to verify a user's identity and/or the source of the user's funds, such as credit cards, ATM cards, check cards, etc. These systems or databases may include a computer server or other similar systems that provide a front end interface to a database. The information submitted by the user is verified by using the computer server or system that provides a front end interface. The computer server verifies the user's identity
