There are a few key points that you need to know that will help you when trying to call to construct a custom dojo dialog. The first of those being we need to make sure that we make the native window we will be using as our dojo dialog, otherwise we'll get a ton of errors and a dead window, it'd be better to make this window a blank canvas rather than trying to use one. Call BuildStage We also need to call the dojo.window.on() method to get the window opened when the dialog is created. Now we can make any customizations we want to the window to be added to this. The modal trigger method has a callback function that gets invoked when the user clicks on the button. In our example, we want to close the dialog when the button is pressed. The last thing that we need is for the window to be visible and with focus. //call this to toggle visibility //dojo.window.curTarget = dojo.window.curTarget === false? true : false; //call this to set the focus dojo.window.focus(); And that should do it. You'll notice that we create a custom dojo dialog that has the main features you'd expect in a dialog (you can change the title, url, id, and close button). Now this dialog isn't suited for large amounts of data but it's easy enough to work with for the information we're trying to pass through it and it's really quick and easy to create. In the backend, we'll need to make sure that we're handling the data correctly. This might be a little bit of work, but it's still a lot simpler than using a dojo dialog. We're going to make a data object that has a model and an attribute `toString: function(){ return JSON.stringify(this); }` We can set the attribute value and it'll show up in the `ModelView` we're using for the Backbone template. After all of this is setup, we just need to pass the attribute to a widget via `attribute` and `model`. Because it's a custom widget, it doesn't really have a data payload or any callbacks. We're just going to do something simple here. The `ui.View` is just going to keep it's data in a variable. The callback
