A cyan-emitting diode (LED) may be used as a light-emitting device in a backlight of a display panel, for example. The LED may be used with other display panels that are illuminated to display content. Typically, the blue light emitted by the LED is mixed with red and green light produced by phosphors coated on respective subpixels, to achieve a high color gamut. However, a typical LED may include only red and green phosphors as its phosphors. Accordingly, there may be a lack of blue light output by the LED. Further, the typical LED may not be capable of generating desirable spectra of different colors. For example, a phosphor-coated white LED may display a color gamut that is different from that of other LEDs of a different color. A color gamut refers to the color gamut of a device that displays content, and is expressed in a color space. Typical LED may have less than 65% chromaticity of the gamut of the human eye. Hence, the color gamut of the typical LED may be limited and the power efficiency thereof may be low.

What's New in the?

In 2012, 11 months after the commercial-grade batteries in the iPad first got a discharge warning, Apple publicly complained about all the premature replacements. These days, the warning appears after only about a year of normal use. The number of batteries replaced in a given 12-month period has since dropped to 1.5 per 1,000 units, down from 4.7 per 1,000 units last year. Apple's own health-tracking software now warns users when their battery life is starting to decline. Battery-life is a kind of gadget self-discipline. For a consumer, battery life is a kind of gadget self-discipline. The more you use a device, the less it lasts. That's true for your cellphone, laptop, all-day digital camera, tablet, and every other kind of gadget you own. Apple makes a big deal of its own longevity. Its marketing materials brag about the company's 94 percent return rate, over 30 years. "Apple engineers have been working hard to make sure that the batteries last as long as possible," they claim. "If our tracking data is any indication, over time, this increased battery life will mean that our users will use their iPhone less and less." But what's worth noting is that Apple's survival rate is really the better measure of its longevity. Rather than merely counting the percentage of devices that remain functional after a given number of years, life expectancy is defined by the percentage of devices that are ever repaired or replaced at all. Last year, for example, Apple's computing devices collectively experienced a replacement rate of 2.8 per 1,000. That's worse than the average phone, which experiences a replacement rate of 2.1 per 1,000. Only a couple of computers per 1,000 ever experience a hardware failure. Three years ago, Apple's median life expectancy was 2.5 per 1,000, or roughly what you might expect if half of devices were getting repaired each year. Since then, the median has risen to 2.9 per 1,000, and if Apple's own marketing claims were to be believed, it's now almost at its design goal of 3.0. Before the publicity-shy CEO takes this one last victory lap, however, let's talk about the standard caveats. People don't replace
